299.

EXHAUSTION OF THE INTELLECT.— -Our occasional coldness and indifference towards people, which is imputed to us as hardness and defect of character, is often only an exhaustion of the intellect. In this state other men are to us, as we are to ourselves, tedious or immaterial.

300.

"THE ONE THING NEEDFUL." — If we are clever, the one thing we need is to have joy in our hearts. " Ah," adds some one, " if we are clever, the best thing we can do is to be wise."

A SIGN OF LOVE. — Some one said, " There are two persons about whom I have never thought deeply. That is a sign of my love for them."

302.

How WE SEEK TO IMPROVE BAD ARGUMENTS. — Many a man adds a bit of his personality to his bad arguments, as if they would thus go better and change into straight and good arguments. In the same way, players at skittles, even after a throw, try to give a direction to the ball by turns and gestures.

HONESTY. — It is but a small thing to be a pattern sort of man with regard to rights and property — for
